In 1816 Stirling received his first patent for a new type of "air engine." The engines he built, and those that followed, eventually became known as "hot air engines." They continued to be called hot air engines until the 1940s, when other gases such as helium and hydrogen were used as the working fluid.

The rise of internal-combustion (gasoline and diesel engines) saw Stirling engines sidelined, though they were rediscovered by the Philips company in the mid-20th century. More recently, they've become popular in solar power plants and other forms of renewable energy, where their higher efficiency is prized.
